THE MOTHER'S RESOLVE.

It was late tea-time at Mr. Mervyn's pleasant parlor, in his commodious and comfortable house, in Boston. Mrs. Mervyn was sitting by the fire awaiting the return of her husband from his store.

They were really pretty children, though pale and delicate; but, notwithstanding their unattractively flushed faces, disheveled hair, and angry looks, their appearance was anything but agreeable.

"I don't know exactly; look it out on the map," said Anne, with a smile. "I can't, there's such a crowd of little names here; what is most, I won't do it for you. I've got so low in my class now, I would as lief be at the foot as anywhere else."

"When he was gone, Mrs. Mervyn burst into a passion of tears. The fountains of feeling seemed stirred to their most depths. At first she pitied herself; she was angry with her husband and her children. She called to mind the fact that she was married to a man whose husband considerably older than herself.

passed through her mind, she wept the more. Mrs. Mervyn, it is true, was married too early; she had begun young. But she was a woman of deep feelings, and earnest, though unformed and undeveloped.

"Resolved, that the first duty of the day performed by me shall be a prayer to Almighty God, and especially for strength and wisdom, properly to instruct, guide, and govern my children." "Resolved, that I will never permit either of my children, with impunity, willfully to disobey me, or treat me with disrespect."

"Resolved, that I will cultivate a habit of cheerful duties, and interest myself in the little matters of my children; that I may thereby gain their love." "Resolved, that I will give up the habit of lounging; that I will break off the reading of novels, and devote the time to study and to reading, and to the pursuit of my duties, and to the study of the Bible."

uncomfortable than the breakfast had been. The children went to school in the afternoon, but with red eyes and angry tempers. Nor was it much better at tea. They were moody and discontented.

"My children," said she, "I love you dearly. I love you, and your father loves you, because you are our children. We wish to make you good, that we may love you, and that we may be able to give you a better home than we have now."

"My children," said she, "I love you dearly. I love you, and your father loves you, because you are our children. We wish to make you good, that we may love you, and that we may be able to give you a better home than we have now."

The dinner was still more stormy and uncomfortable than the breakfast had been. The children went to school in the afternoon, but with red eyes and angry tempers. Nor was it much better at tea.

than formerly to her children, she found she had more leisure for household occupation, general reading, and social enjoyment, than ever before. The purpose, extended into every department, and gave firmness and confidence to one who had hitherto been rather a weak woman.

"My children," said she, "I love you dearly. I love you, and your father loves you, because you are our children. We wish to make you good, that we may love you, and that we may be able to give you a better home than we have now."

Her husband, coming in rather late one evening, told her that he had been to take tea with the Mervyns. "How did you find them?" asked Mrs. Weston. "It is long since I have been able to see them."

wards a little sketch of Ulysses, as detailed in the Odyssey. "How interesting!" said Anne. "How I should like to read the Odyssey! After all, though I don't believe a word of these old stories, it must be very pleasant to know all about them; for we are meeting with something or other about them in almost every book we see."

kept away from them on purpose. They used to be always in trouble with their children. Their house was a very uncomfortable place." "Is it better now?" "Better! I would not know the children; you would scarcely know the parents. In the first place, the children have lost the pale, puffy look they used to have; they were blooming with health and sparkling with spirits, yet they were not ruddy. I watched them; they were kind to each other, polite to me, and obedient to a word or a look from their parents. When I went in they were studying their lessons, which they were anxious to finish before tea. When they were in difficulty they called upon their mother, and she gave them just that degree of help and encouragement which would make them think for and exert themselves. They had as good manners at the table as I ever saw in children. At eight o'clock a company of young people came in, and found it was a kind of regular Thursday eve. At last, Willie said to his mother, 'I've been thinking of you ever since we were introduced; Mervyn and his wife occasionally joining, at the request of Anne or Willie, who seemed delighted when father and mother would take a party; mother, especially, was often called upon, and I could see the children were right. The children evidently think there is nobody in the world like their mother.'"

THE SPEECH OF THE PRESIDENT.

On the anniversary of the birthday of Washington, in the city of Washington, Mr. Johnson, President of the United States, made a speech to those who had come there to hear it from his lips.

The speech was one which, although dispirited and apparently careless, was evidently carefully prepared and well studied, as its logic had but one direction, and its whole tenor was to show that the address effective upon the audience who had there assembled.

The speech of Alexander Stevens. Alexander Stevens after quitting for awhile with the Georgia Legislature, has accepted the choice of that body and consents to consider himself a Senator of the United States, for the State of Georgia.

Once more we say we welcome the New Englanders, but still think a little more modesty in their appreciation of themselves and depreciation of us, would be of great advantage to them.

There is no class of people whose interests are so much affected by the course of our country as the farmers of our country.

It is becoming more and more doubtful whether the financial bill, prepared by Mr. McCulloch for the action of the Congress, will pass.

Attention is called to the advertisements of public sales which appear in the Pioneer this week.

EDUCATIONAL ENTERPRISE.

There has been in the southern parts of our State, generally, a great lack of educational enterprise.

Mr. George Vandenhoff, the celebrated dramatist and author, gave dramatic recitations of the best plays of the world, and his program was not as large as it should have been for the benefit of the Young Men's Christian Association of this city.

On Saturday morning last, Mr. Eli Long's horse took fright near the corner of Commerce and Pearl streets, ran down Commerce, with Mr. Long in its open wagon, which struck the wheel of a carriage, demolishing it, and then striking the bridge, broke the pole of the carriage.

It will probably cost from thirty to fifty thousand dollars, and we hope our citizens will be content to see the city pass for a few days, and then gradually recovering from the disaster.

Robert Sinclair has been so overwhelmed with letters from the ladies since he advertised two weeks ago in the Pioneer for a companion, that he has not had time to answer them.

The bill to incorporate the proposed new railway, which passed the House of Representatives last week, and is now before the Senate.
